Portfolio Diversification: Stability and Transparency of the Global Futures Industry

Managed futures accounts, like all other accounts of customers doing business through a U.S. exchange, must be executed by and carried on the books of a “clearing member” (a brokerage firm or futures commission merchant (FCM) that holds a membership in an exchange’s clearing organization). Once a trade between two clearing members is matched by the exchange, the rights and obligations under the futures or options contract do not run between the original buyer and seller; instead, they are between the seller and the clearing organization.

An exchange’s clearing organization guarantees performance on every contract to each of its clearing members.

Although each exchange’s clearing function operates somewhat differently, at minimum they all ensure that there are sufficient resources to meet obligations by:

- :: collecting performance bonds;
- :: marking contracts to the market at least once daily; and
- :: establishing capital requirements and maintaining minimum financial standards for clearing members.
